

ALMA MATER STUDIORUM
UNIVERSITÀ DI BOLOGNA

ARCHIVIO ISTITUZIONALE
DELLA RICERCA

Alma Mater Studiorum Università di Bologna Archivio istituzionale della ricerca

The Evolution of Tunisian Salafism after the Revolution: From La Maddhabiyya to Salafi-Malikism

This is the final peer-reviewed author's accepted manuscript (postprint) of the following publication:

Published Version:

Fabio Merone, Théo Blanc, Ester Sigillò (2021). The Evolution of Tunisian Salafism after the Revolution: From La Maddhabiyya to Salafi-Malikism. INTERNATIONAL JOURNAL OF MIDDLE EAST STUDIES, 53(3), 455-470 [10.1017/S0020743821000143].

Availability:

This version is available at: <https://hdl.handle.net/11585/821835> since: 2021-06-11

Published:

DOI: <http://doi.org/10.1017/S0020743821000143>

Terms of use:

Some rights reserved. The terms and conditions for the reuse of this version of the manuscript are specified in the publishing policy. For all terms of use and more information see the publisher's website.

This item was downloaded from IRIS Università di Bologna (<https://cris.unibo.it/>).
When citing, please refer to the published version.

(Article begins on next page)

The Evolution of Tunisian Salafism After the Revolution: From Lā Maddhabiyya to Salafi-Malikism

Fabio Merone¹, Théo Blanc² and Ester Sigillò*³

Abstract

What shape does Salafism take in Tunisia after the ban of the Salafī-Jihadi group Ansar al Sharia and the wave of securitization carried out by national authorities? This article argues that a constraining legal context put Salafism's doctrinal rigidity in tension with its survival and ultimately prompted a residual current of Salafī actors to accommodate their stance towards Malikism, the prevalent school (madhhab) in the country. This adaptation is at odds with contemporary Salafism, which traditionally dismisses all four law schools (lā madhabiyya), rejects their blind imitation (taqlīd), and claims the superiority of the Qur'an, hadith and consensus of the salaf over jurisprudence (fiqh). In order to account for this puzzle, this article scrutinizes the historical development of Salafism and the evolution of its stance towards Malikism across three generational waves. It notably shows how religious securitization associated with the promotion of a 'moderate' Islam pushed Salafī actors to redefine their ideology in order to preserve their preaching and teaching activities. We call Salafi-Malikism the outcome of this adaptive strategy. Drawing on the Tunisian case, we argue that, despite its purist claims, Salafism is not an immutable religious current, yet it can take different trajectories in order to survive in constraining environments.

Keywords: Tunisia, Islam, Salafism, Malikism, Salafi-Malikism

¹ Centre Interdisciplinaire de Recherche sur l'Afrique et le Moyen-Orient, Université Laval, Québec, Canada

² Department of Social and Political Sciences, European University, Florence, Italy

³ Robert Schuman Centre for Advanced Studies, European University Institute, Florence, Italy

*Corresponding author. Email: ester.sigillo@eui.eu

Introduction

The Arab uprisings have led to the resurgence of religious parties and movements after several decades of repression. In Tunisia, immediately after the fall of the Ben Ali regime in January 2011, the religious field witnessed the rise of new grassroots entrepreneurs, often “self-made imams” leaning towards Salafism, not appointed by the state.⁴ By 2012-13, the ideological spectrum of the Islamic landscape had crystallized into four main trends: Islamists akin to the Muslim Brothers (represented by Ennahdha), Salafi political parties (the most prominent being Jabhat al-Islah), religious associations of various ideological affiliations, and revolutionary Salafi-Jihadis (mainly Ansar al-Sharia). This scenario lasted until 2013, when the assassination of two leftist political leaders by a Jihadi commando triggered a severe political crisis which ultimately led the Islamist party in power, Ennahda, to formally cut its relationships with Salafi actors and to relinquish power in favour of a technocratic government. Consequently, the Salafi socio-political landscape was reshuffled: the Salafi-Jihadi group Ansar al-Sharia was banned, and Salafi associations suspected to have links with terrorist groups shut down.

After these events, the success of the political transition hinged on the ability of the two main contenders on the political scene, the Islamist Ennahda and the modernist Nidaa Tounès, to reach an agreement over the adoption of a new constitution and the creation of a “government of national unity,” respectively in January and October 2014.⁵ These deals meant the acceptance of Ennahda in the institutional field as a legitimate political force but also the redefinition of Tunisian religious space. Therefore, mosques and several religious associations were brought under the state's control and regulated under a more stringent legal framework.⁶ In 2015, as a reaction to the double attacks at the Bardo Museum in Tunis and the resort in Soussa, the government officially announced a new campaign of securitization under the label of the “war against terrorism,” aiming at curtailing all the “extremisms” present in the country.⁷

⁴ Georges Fahmi and Hamza Meddeb, “Market for Jihad: Radicalization in Tunisia,” Carnegie Middle East Center (October 2015) [online paper], <https://carnegie-mec.org/2015/10/15/market-for-jihad-radicalization-in-tunisia-pub-61629>(accessed on 27 February 2021).

⁵ Duncan Pickard, “Prospects for implementing democracy in Tunisia,” Mediterranean Politics 19, no. 2 (2014): 259-64, <https://doi.org/10.1080/13629395.2014.917796>.

Government security policies came hand in hand with the institutional and political actors' official discourses promoting a “moderate” and “local” Islam, and excluding those religious expressions perceived as “radical.”⁸ These discourses have also fostered a nationalist religious canon that emphasizes the role of the Zeituna, the historical Tunisian university-mosque that distinguished itself over decades for its teaching approach based on the predominant madhhab in the country, the Maliki school.⁹ The security campaign backed by the abovementioned discourses, has actually echoed the pre-revolutionary regime's policies aiming at promoting a “controlled” domestic Islam in contrast to the “radical Islam” usually associated with religious actors who are deemed strangers to the Tunisian context. Since independence in

⁶ Ester Sigillò, Islamism and the rise of Islamic charities in post-authoritarian Tunisia: claiming Political Islam through other means? British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies(2020): 1-19; [Published Online]<https://doi.org/10.1080/13530194.2020.1861926>.

⁷ David Gartenstein-Ross and Bridget Moreng, “Tunisian jihadism after the Sousse massacre,” CTC Sentinel 8 (2015): 13-18; Fatemah Al Zubairi, “The Role of Colonialism and Neo-Colonialism in Shaping Anti-Terrorism. Law in Comparative and International Perspectives: Case Studies of Egypt and Tunisia” (PhD diss., York University, 2017).

⁸ “Mounir Tlili : Promouvoir un discours religieux modéré et rationnel”, Directinfo, May 3, 2014, <https://directinfo.webmanagercenter.com/2014/05/03/mounir-tlili-promouvoir-un-discours-religieux-moderate-et-rationnel/> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

⁹ Interview with the responsible of Religious associations at the Ministry of Religious Affairs. Tunis, July 2019. See also, “La Tunisie renforce l'enseignement de l'islam modéré”, Kapitalis, June 28, 2014, <http://www.kapitalis.com/politique/23153-la-tunisie-renforce-l-enseignement-de-l-islam-moderate-video.html> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

1956, the Bourguiba (1956-1987) and Ben Ali (1987-2011) regimes had in fact rooted their modernist, nationalist ideology in the claim of a “Tunisian specificity” linked to the Zeitunian tradition.¹⁰ The post-2013 governments re-activated this frame: Zeitunian teachings, as also reported by local media and political actors, embodied a “traditional” Tunisian Islam which is considered incompatible with religious “extremisms” imported from the Gulf, namely Salafism.¹¹ The securitization campaign and the institutional discourses have been backed by a large stratum of society, such as secular associations, but also by religious organizations which increasingly regard Salafism as a form of religiosity linked to extremism and violence, and alien to Tunisian religious traditions. The label “Salafi” was indeed routinely associated with intolerance and terrorism by local media and in several official speeches of secular political parties, which pushed many Salafis to dissimulate or drop the label altogether from 2015 onwards.¹²

The reconfiguration of the Salafi movement that followed this new security-centred scenario is the focus of this article. How have Salafis coped in the last seven years with an increasingly constraining environment? While, after the ban of Ansar al Sharia, Jihadi Salafism has become largely radicalized and political Salafism has almost disappeared, we argue that a “scholastic” Salafi trend managed to survive the harsh constraints set by national authorities, by conforming to the Maliki school, the prevalent doctrine in the country.¹³ In other words, we aim to demonstrate how “Malikization” constituted a survival strategy on the part of Salafis in order to preserve their religious and teaching activities in the face of the securitization and domestication of the religious field. We label the outcome of this adaptive strategy “Salafism-Malikism.” This evolution constitutes a puzzling situation with regard to the academic literature, which argues that Salafism rejects the imitation (taqlīd) of the four traditional juridical schools in line with the writings of the first Salafi scholars, Ibn Taymiyya (1263-1328), Ibn al-Qayyim (1292-1350) and al-Shawkani (1759-1839).¹⁴ In legal matters, Salafis indeed “usually deny that the four Sunni schools of Islamic law have any authority apart from the canonical primary sources on which each body of jurisprudence is supposed to be based.”¹⁵ Ultimately, we show that like the Islamist party Ennahda which turned into a conservative party in time of acute legitimization crisis, Salafis are not immutable actors; on the contrary, they may prioritize survival over doctrinal rigidity in repressive contexts.¹⁶ This echoes a body of literature that, although tackling the political rather than the legal/cultural dimension of Salafi adaptation, highlights trends of nationalization.¹⁷

¹⁰ Edward Webb, “The ‘Church’ of Bourguiba: Nationalizing Islam in Tunisia,” Sociology of Islam 1 (2013): 17-40, <https://doi.org/10.1163/22131418-00101002>; Rory McCarthy, “Re-thinking secularism in post-independence Tunisia,” The Journal of North African Studies 19, no. 5 (2014): 733-50, <https://doi.org/10.1080/13629387.2014.917585>

¹¹ “La Tunisie renforce l’enseignement de l’islam modéré.”

¹² Théo Blanc, “La politisation du salafisme après les révolutions arabes. Le cas tunisien” (M.A. diss., Institut d’Etudes Politiques de Grenoble, 2018), 55-63; Théo Blanc, “Être “islamiste” ou “salafiste” en 2018,” La Lettre de l’IRMC 22, IRMC/CNRS (April-October 2018).

¹³ Salafī movements in the Arab world have for the most part refrained from political participation. The phenomenon gained academic and political attention in North Africa after Arab Uprisings, with the Salafist al-Nour party in Egypt as the most emblematic example. See Georges Fahmi, “The Future of Political Salafism in Egypt and Tunisia”, Carnegie Middle East Center, November 16, 2015, <https://carnegie-mec.org/2015/11/16/future-of-political-salafism-in-egypt-and-tunisia-pub-61871>); Stefano Torelli, Stefano M., Fabio Merone, and Francesco Cavatorta. "Salafism in Tunisia: challenges and opportunities for democratization." Middle East Policy 19, no. 4 (2012): 140-54; Fabio Merone, “Between social contention and takfirism: the evolution of the Salafi-jihadi movement in Tunisia,” Mediterranean Politics 22, no. 1 (2017): 71-90, <https://doi.org/10.1080/13530194.2015.973188>; Blanc, “La politisation du salafisme”.

¹⁴ Quintan Wiktorowicz, “The New Global Threat: Transnational Salafis and Jihad,” Middle East Policy 8, no. 4 (2001): 21, <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1475-4967.2001.tb00006.x>; Rougier Bernard, Qu'est-ce que le salafisme? (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 2008), 19; Bernard Haykel, “On the Nature of Salafi Thought and Action,” in Global Salafism: Islam's New Religious Movement, ed. Roel Meijer (New York: Columbia University Press, 2009): 44; Henri Lauzière, “The Construction of Salafiyya: Reconsidering Salafism from the Perspective of Conceptual History,” International Journal of Middle East Studies 42, no. 3 (2010): 309. doi:10.1017/S0020743810000401; Frederic Wehrey and Anouar Boukhars, Salafism in the Maghreb. Politics, Piety, and Militancy (Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2020), 6.

The article is structured as follows. In the first part we provide a historical overview of the Salafis’ first generation (1970-80s) and second generation (1980-90s) and their relationship with Malikism, and clarify the reasons for the latter’s rejection of taqlīd. We then describe and situate the transformations of the Salafi actors after the 2010/2011 revolution in the broader political context. We highlight how the political crisis in 2013, the following securitization campaign and Ennahdha’s pragmatic turn in 2014 have all contributed to a strategic adaption of residual Salafis vis-à-vis the prevailing Maliki school, which is identified with “authentic”

¹⁵ Henri Lauzière, The Making of Salafism: Islamic reform in the twentieth century (New York: Columbia University Press, 2016), 8.

¹⁶ Ester Sigillò, "Ennahdha et l'essor des associations islamiques en Tunisie: revendiquer l'islam politique au-delà de la dimension partisane?." L'Année du Maghreb, no. 22, (2020): 113-29.

¹⁷ See for instance Terje Ostebo, “Growth and Fragmentation: The Salafi Movement in Bale, Ethiopia,” in Global Salafism: Islam's New Religious Movement, 344-65; Shpend Kursani, “Salafi pluralism in national contexts: the secular state, nation and militant Islamism in Kosovo, Albania, and Macedonia,” Southeast European and Black Sea Studies 18, no. 2 (2018): 301-17. In Egypt, for example, Salafi political parties obtained representation in the People’s Assembly in 2011 (127 seats out of 498) and the Consultative Council (45 seats out of 180) and proved particularly skilful at co-opting local elites and tribe chieftains; see Clément Steuer, “Les salafistes dans le champ politique égyptien”, Politique étrangère, no. 4 (2013): 133-143.

Tunisian Islam. We dedicate a final part to the discursive adaptation by Salafis to this new context, before discussing to what extent it also encompasses a theological transformation.¹⁸

The research is based on a corpus of 26 semi-structured and open-ended interviews conducted by the authors between 2013 and 2020 with Salafi shaykhs, rank-and-file followers and representatives of the most relevant organizations specialized in religious studies still active in the country: the University Imam Malik for Sharia Sciences (from now on Imam Malik University), the Association Imam Malik for Sharia Sciences (from now on Imam Malik Association), the Tunisian section of the International Association of Muslim Scholars (IAMS) and the Rabta Qur'aniyya (Qur'anic League). Authors have also interviewed members of Islamist associations, Ennahdha leaders, state officials and the officials of the ministry of religious affairs. Interview data are cross-checked as well as triangulated with participant observations, document analysis of public speeches and immersive fieldwork.

Malikism and Salafism in Tunisia Before 2011

Malikism is one of Sunni Islam's four schools of religious law (madāhib) broadly spread in North Africa, especially in Tunisia.¹⁹ In Tunisia Malikism is often cited as a key foundation of the country's religious tolerance, contrasting starkly with radical takfiri ideology that, for example, brands non-practicing Muslims as infidels.²⁰ Malikism was introduced in the Maghreb alongside Hanafism by the jurist `Assad ibn al-Furat (758-828), a student of Malik Ibn Anas (711-795) in Madina. Maliki jurists particularly asserted themselves in Kairouan, in Tunisia, which was the old capital of the independent Aghlabid emirate of Ifriqiyya (800-909).²¹ The Great Mosque of Kairouan founded in 670 was then the most important centre of Maliki teaching.²² The most famous among these Kairouan-based jurists is Abu Muhammad `Abd Allah ibn Abi Zayd al-Qayrawani (922-96), whose book al-Risala (The Message) is considered to be the third reference of Malikism.²³ Today, Malik, Sahnun, ibn Sahnun and al-Qayrawani remain the central references of Maliki jurists and `ulama`.

¹⁸ The entire article is the byproduct of a joint writing effort. The three authors jointly wrote the introduction, the first part entitled "Malikism and Salafism in Tunisia before 2011" and the conclusion. Fabio Merone mostly led the work in the second section entitled "Salafism and Malikism in Tunisia After 2011"; Ester Sigillò mostly led the work in the third section entitled "The 2013-2014 Turning Point: Securitization and Domestication of the Religious Field" Théo Blanc mostly led the work in the fourth section entitled "Salafi-Malikism: the Discourse of Theological Compromise."

¹⁹ Malikism's foundational book is Malik's Muwatta (Well-trodden path), a compendium of fiqh composed in the second half of the eighth century, which also constitutes the oldest source of hadith (the Prophet's deeds and sayings). The second reference of Malikism is the book al-Mudawwana (corpus, code) elaborated by Sahnun ibn

Although Kairouan constituted the first focal point of Malikism in Tunisia, the Zeituna mosque and university in Tunis – founded in 698 and 737 respectively – progressively became the main centre of Maliki religious teaching starting from the second half of the eleventh century.²⁴ The centralization of power in Tunis from 1159 onwards by the Almohad caliph `Abd

Habib al-Tanukhi (776-854); Abdel-Magid Turki, "Le Muwaṭṭa' de Mālik, ouvrage de fiqh, entre le ḥadīth et le ra'y, ou Comment aborder l'étude du mālikisme kairouanais au IV/Xe siècle," Studia Islamica 86 (1997): 5-35.

²⁰ Pietro Longo, "Salafism and Takfirism in Tunisia Between Al-Nahda's Discourses and Local Peculiarities," Working Paper/MESC/2016/01, Middle East Studies Center, The American University of Cairo (2016).

²¹ Michael Bonner, Jihad in Islamic History: Doctrines and Practice (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2006): 109; Mathias von Bredow, Der heilige Krieg (g̃iha`d) aus der Sicht der malikitischen Rechtsschule (Stuttgart: Franz Steiner Verlag, 1994).

²² Roland Anthony Oliver and Anthony Atmore, Medieval Africa: 1250-1800 (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2001), 36.

²³ Russell Hopley, "Ibn Abi Zayd al-Qayrawani," in Henry Louis Gates et al., Dictionary of African Biography (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2012), 100.

²⁴ Mahmud Abd al-Mawla, L'université zaytounienne et la société tunisienne (Tunis : Maison Tiers-Monde, 1984), 33.

al-Mu'min (r. 1094-1163) further contributed to the establishment of Zeituna's hegemony as the epicentre of Malikism in the Maghreb.²⁵

Tunisian Maliki `ulama' continued to have an important role under the French protectorate (1888-1956), although religious associations had to face several restrictions.²⁶ After independence, the rise to power of Habib Bourguiba (1956-87) marked the full marginalization of the Maliki `ulama' of the Zeituna. In May 1956, a presidential decree transferred the direct supervision of religious institutions from the awqāf (religious endowments) to the state. By doing so, Bourguiba initiated the religious and financial demise of the Zeituna `ulama' embodying the traditional Maliki religiosity, who he saw as an obstacle to his modernization policies.²⁷ In 1958, Bourguiba closed the Zeituna education system, which he integrated into public secondary education through a faculty of theology (in the University of Tunis).²⁸ In 1961, the head imam of the Zeituna mosque was discharged, while the imam of the Grand Mosque in Kairouan was transferred to another mosque. The state's absorption of the Zeituna, "provoked increasing animosity in society" and, according to some authors, contributed to the politicization of Islam.²⁹ The first expression of political religious movement which sought the support of the few Zeituni `ulama' was the al-Jama'a al-Islamiyya (Islamic ²⁵ Lewis, Mary Dewhurst. Divided Rule: Sovereignty and Empire in French Tunisia, 1881-1938 (Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 2013).

²⁶ Major families of Zeituni Maliki `ulama' include the Enneifer family, the Djaït family and the Ben Achour family.

²⁷ Boulby, "The Islamic Challenge", 593

²⁸ Marion Boulby, "The Islamic Challenge: Tunisia since Independence," Third World Quarterly 10, no. 2, (1988): 592.

²⁹ Hostrup R. Haugbolle and Francescro Cavatorta, "Beyond Ghannouchi: Islamism and Social Change in Tunisia," Middle East Report 262 (2012): 20-25. Anne Wolf, Political Islam in Tunisia: The History of Ennahda (Oxford, UK Oxford University Press, 2017).

Group) created in 1969 by Rached Ghannouchi, `Abd al-Fattah Mourou and Ahmida Ennaifer, three leaders who were inspired by the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood .³⁰

This first mobilization, mainly led by Islamist actors (inspired by the Muslim Brotherhood's ideology), included also what we could call the "first generation of Salafis,"³¹ who were not in opposition to Maliki fiqh.³² According to Ahmida Ennaifer, one of the leaders of the al-Jama'a al-Islamiyya, "although Salafis affirm that they should think outside the juridical schools," they considered fiqh as "a matter for specialists" and part of them accepted it insofar they were also concerned with acquiring a religious formation in a holistic understanding of Islam.³³ In 1981 the al-Jama'a al-Islamiyya became a party, the Harakat al-Ittihad al-Islami (Islamic Tendency Movement, the precursor of the Ennahdha party). This transformation was marked by a number of militants refusing the political institutionalization of the movement, against any form of compromise with the authoritarian regime. Thus, in 1986 this first generation of purists created the Tunisian Islamic Front, al-Jabha al-Islamiyya. As acknowledged by its members, this group has maintained a positive attitude towards Malikism until today.³⁴ As Rafiq al-'Ouni, an historic leader of al-Jabha al-Islamiyya and founder of the Salafi party Jabhat al-Islah in 2011, reports, "all ijtihād (interpretative effort) in the framework of Islam and Islamic culture is acceptable and beneficial. As far as Imam Malik is concerned, we respect this madhhab and we take from it all that is beneficial for the Islamic community

³⁰ Mohamed Hamdi, The Politicisation of Islam: A Case Study of Tunisia (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1998): 13-14.

³¹ Wolf, Political Islam in Tunisia, 122.

³² Interview with Ahmida Ennaifer, Bardo, 08/01/2020. On the ideological divide between Islamist and Salafists see Annette Ranko and Justyna Nedza. "Crossing the Ideological divide? Egypt's Salafists and the Muslim Brotherhood after the Arab Spring." Studies in Conflict & Terrorism 39, no. 6 (2016): 519-41.

³³ Ibid.

³⁴ Interview with Rafiq al-'Ouni, historic leader of al-Jabha al-Islamiyya, June 30, 2019, Tunis.

(al-Umma al-Islāmiyya).³⁵ Moreover, Muhammad `Ali Harrath, another al-Jabha al-Islamiyya leader, said that Salafis considered the madhhab of Imam Malik as their principal reference.³⁶ Some scholars designated this current as “Maliki Salafis”.³⁷ According to Abdelmajid Charfi, president of the Bayt al-Hikma Foundation - the Tunisian Academy of Sciences, Letters and Arts - this current of Tunisian Salafism is very specific, “insofar it inscribes its discourse into Malikism.”³⁸ This current, which exists in Tunisia to this day, was however be side-lined in the 1990-2000s by a new generation of Salafis opposed to Malikism and law schools in general.

In the 1990s-2000s, a new generation of Salafis more in line with Levantine Salafism and Saudi Wahhabism emerged in Tunisia and established its distance from the Islamist movement, Ennahda.³⁹ The appeal of these Salafis stemmed largely from the monopoly exerted by the state on religion and the perceived religious void this created, which Salafi sympathizers were able to take advantage of.⁴⁰ As Kamel Marzouqi, a rising Salafi figure at the time, explains, the Zeituna Theology University, the centre and symbol of Maliki Tunisian Islam, “was completely monopolized by the ‘RCDists’ [member of the Rassemblement Constitutionnel Démocratique, the former party in power].”⁴¹ There was in practice no religious instruction outside of it, with the exception of the state-controlled Rabta Qur’ania (the Qur’anic League) and the Associations for the Safeguard of the Qur’an, respectively created in the 1960s and 1970s under Bourguiba’s regime. Consequently, the domestication of Islam by the authoritarian

³⁵ Interview, June 30, 2019, Tunis.

³⁶ Longo, “Salafism and Takfirism in Tunisia.”

³⁷ Ibid: 9.

³⁸ Interview with Abdelmajid Charfi, president of the Bayt al-Hikma Foundation, February 21, 2018, Carthage.

³⁹ Fabio Merone and Francesco Cavatorta, “Salafist Mouvance and Sheikh-ism in the Tunisian Democratic Transition,” Working Papers in International Studies, Dublin City University (2012), 4.

⁴⁰ Allani, “Islamism and Salafism in Tunisia”; Fahmi and Meddeb, “Market for Jihad.”.]

⁴¹ Interview with Kamel Marzouqi, November 21, 2019, Soussa.

state, the so-called “Islam of state,” favoured, as a reaction, the birth of a new Salafi generation drawing its references from scholars located in Egypt, Syria, and the Arabian Peninsula.. As Muhammad Khouja, former president of Hizb Jabhat al-Islah (Reform Front Party) and a historic Salafi figure who observed the emergence of this new Salafi generation puts it, “the youth did not find good references in Tunisia, so they looked towards the Orient [i.e. Middle East].”⁴² According to Kamel Marzouqi “many young people were thirsty for religious instruction and started to look for any source available.”⁴³ Salafi satellite channels broadcasting from Saudi Arabia and Egypt appeared as the only available source of religious education, and played a major role in socializing youth into Salafi norms.⁴⁴ In parallel, new religious seekers organized themselves in small communities of people gathering in private houses, reflecting on religious topics and seeking to further their religious knowledge.⁴⁵ Private teaching associations also emerged to respond to the new demand, often led by self-taught religious teachers who contributed to the coalescence of a marginal religious community by the end of the 2000s.⁴⁶ One case in point is the online portal launched in 2002 by Kamel Marzouqi, among the very first Salafi scholars to propose private religious instruction, which was followed by 500 students.⁴⁷ Another Salafi institute was the Ibn Massoud school, which mostly taught the Qur’an

⁴² Thierry Brésillon, “Tunisie : un parti « salafiste » pour quoi faire ?,” L’OBS, July 7, 2012, <https://www.nouvelobs.com/rue89/rue89-tunisie-libre/20120710.RUE1156/tunisie-un-parti-salafiste-pour-quoi-faire.html> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

⁴³ Interview with Kamel Marzouqi, November 21, 2019, Soussa.

⁴⁴ Théo Blanc, “Salafisme(s) postrévolutionnaire(s) en Tunisie : un « paradoxe tunisien » ?,” Moyen-Orient 44 (2019): 33. For Salafi-Jihadis, the main resource was the website “Platform for Unification and Jihad” (minbar al-tawhid wa-l-jihad), <http://www.ilmway.com/site/maqdis/d.html> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

⁴⁵ Interview with Sami Brahem, Islamic intellectual and researcher, March 12, 2013, La Marsa.

⁴⁶ Interview with Kamel Marzouqi, February 20, 2013, Tunis.

⁴⁷ Interview with Kamel Marzouqi, February 20, 2013, Tunis and tajwīd (Quranic recitation) before the revolution, and was re-opened in September 2012 under the name of the Imam Malik Association.⁴⁸ Consequently, by the turn of the new millennium, Salafism had already become infused within Tunisian society, albeit forced to remain discreet and not clearly distinguished in different trends.⁴⁹

In contrast with the previous Salafi generation that had been socialized into the Tunisian context, this new generation instead drew its doctrinal positions mainly from Salafi and Wahhabi sheikhs in Egypt and the Gulf who condemned religious practices which were pervasive in Tunisia such as Sufism, saint worship and, in the realm of jurisprudence (fiqh), Malikism. The Salafi rejection of law schools stems from a long intellectual history. In the Middle Ages, the institutionalization of the four Sunni schools of law (Malikism, Shafism, Hanafism, and Hanbalism) had solidified the consensus of the Sunni community around a closed corpus of interpretations of the sacred texts. This effectively meant the closure of the door of ijtihad (interpretation) outside of these established schools in the beginning of the fourth century of the hijra (about 900 AD).⁵⁰ As Joseph Schacht explains, “This 'closing of the door of ijtihad, as it was called, amounted to the demand for taqlid.”⁵¹ In other words, one had to choose one school of law or at least locate one’s religious practice within the limits of this quadrilateral jurisprudential space. Although the closure of the doors of ijtihād and the ⁴⁸ Interview with Muhammad Amin, director of the Imam Malik Association, March 19, 2018, Al Manar 1, Tunis.

⁴⁹ Interview with Kamel Marzouqi, February 20, 2013, Tunis. Marzouqi also taught shari’a sciences at the Ibn Massoud Association from 2008-9 onwards, before creating the University Imam Malik in 2012.

⁵⁰ David S. Powers, Law, Society and Culture in the Maghrib: 1300–1500 (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2002): 2.

⁵¹ Joseph Schacht, An Introduction to Islamic Law (Oxford, UK: The Clarendon Press, 1964), 1.

obligation of taqlīd is as “unsupported historical claim” according to Khaled Abou El Fadl,⁵² what interests us here – beyond historical accuracy, which is for specialists to determine – is that Ibn Taymiyya and Salafis relied on this narrative. Three centuries later, indeed, the jurist and theologian Ibn Taymiyya (1263-1328) forcefully “rejected this consensus of jurists and relocated it to the Prophet’s Companions, al-Salaf al-salih (‘the pious Ancestors’).”⁵³ By doing so, Ibn Taymiyya reopened the door of ijtihad, which he argued should be performed based on the example of the salaf, and on that basis only. In his view, this would remedy the dissent on matters of religion, law and government that resulted from the multiplication of juridical schools. With this unprecedented argument, Ibn Taymiyya “initiated what has become the hallmark among adherents of the modern salafiyya, namely to refuse to identify with a school of law and to insist on following only al-Salaf”.⁵⁴ His student Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziya (1292-1350) similarly rejected both the madāhib (schools) and their taqlīd (imitation).⁵⁵

Ibn Taymiyya’s and Ibn Qayyim’s position has had a major influence on contemporary Salafism, including Wahhabism in Saudi Arabia and the Ahl-e Hadith in India.⁵⁶ In particular, ⁵³ Ulrika Martensson, “The Quran, the Constitution, ‘the Natural’: Divisive Concepts Within Scholarly Islam,” in Fundamentalism in the Modern World vol. 1, ed. Ulrika Martensson, Jennifer Bailey, Priscilla Ringrose and Asbjorn Dyrendal (London: I.B. Tauris, 2011), 39; see also, Henri Laoust, La profession de foi d’Ibn Taymiyya, (Paris: Geuthner, 1986), 84.

⁵² Khaled Abou El Fadl, “The Shari’ah,” in John L. Esposito and Emad El-Din Shahin, The Oxford Handbook of Islam and Politics (New York: Oxford University Press, 2013): 21

⁵⁴ Martensson, “The Quran, the Constitution, ‘the Natural’”, 39; Laoust, La profession de foi, 23-24.

⁵⁵ Haykel, “On the Nature of Salafi Thought and Action,” 44; Brynjar Lia, “‘Destructive Doctrinarians’. Abu Mus’ab al-Suri’s Critique of the Salafis in the Jihadi Current,” in Meijer, Global Salafism, 285. There is some disagreement on whether the rejection of taqlīd originated from Ibn Taymiyya (Martensson’s argument) or his disciple Ibn Qayyim (Haykel’s argument).

⁵⁶ Haykel, “On the Nature of Salafi Thought and Action,” 38; Mariam Abou Zahab, “Salafism in Pakistan: The Ahl-e Hadith Movement,” in Meijer, Global Salafism, 129.

Ibn Taymiyya and Ibn Qayyim laid the bases for a current that would later come to be known as lā madhabiyya (no school).⁵⁷ One major proponent of this current was the Yemeni Muhammad al-Shawkani (1759–1839), one of the founders of Ahl-e Hadith, who “argued that all four existing schools of Sunni jurisprudence had deviated from the teachings of the Prophet Muḥammad.”⁵⁸ Other thinkers such as Khayr al-Din Nu‘man al-Alusi (1836-99) also combined the lā madhabiyya with Taymiyyan theology.⁵⁹ The most recent and perhaps most influential Salafi scholar of the lā madhabiyya trend is, however, Muhammad Nasr al-Din al-Albani (1914-99), a famous Albanian muhadīth (traditionist, expert of the hadith) who taught in Saudi Arabia, Syria and Jordan. As Frank Griffel explains, “Al-Albānī’s position within the contemporary salafiyya movement is so strong and his decisions so revered that the lā madhabiyya attitude which he initially represented almost turned into a fifth legal madhab in Sunni Islam,”⁶⁰ in continuity with the madhab al-salaf proposed by Ibn Taymiyya and Ibn Qayyim.⁶¹ Al-Albani thus severely criticized Saudi Wahhabism for being too embedded in Hanbali fiqh and blindly imitating this legal school, although in theory Wahhabis advocate ijtihad.⁶² Accordingly, contemporary Salafism can correspond to one of three attitudes: the lā madhabiyya approach (al-Albani), the Hanbali Wahhabis, or a combination of the two.⁶³ Overall, Salafis contend that ⁵⁷ Lauzière, “The Construction of Salafiyya,” 209.

⁵⁸ Franck Griffel, “What Do We Mean By “Salafi”? Connecting Muḥammad ‘Abduh with Egypt’s Nūr Party in Islam’s Contemporary Intellectual History,” Die Welt Des Islams 55 (2015): 204-5.

⁵⁹ Griffel, “What Do We Mean By “Salafi”?,” 207.

⁶⁰ Ibid, 209. Italics and transliteration added by the authors.

⁶¹ Lauzière, The Making of Salafism, 8.

⁶² Stéphane Lacroix, “Between Revolution and Apoliticism: Nasir al-Din al-Albani and his Impact on the Shaping of Contemporary Salafism,” in Meijer, Global Salafism., 58-80; Lacroix, Les islamistes saoudiens, 13.

⁶³ Griffel, “What Do We Mean By “Salafi”?,” 210; see also see Frank E. Vogel, Islamic Law and Legal System: Studies of Saudi Arabia (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000), 125-26.

law schools did not exist at the time of the Prophet, and therefore that the Qur'an, the hadith and the consensus of the salaf have precedence over all other sources of religious normativity.⁶⁴

In Tunisia, the la madhhabiyya tradition translated into a rejection of the official school of Malikism by the second generation of Salafis. The absence of “free” religious curriculum in Tunisia that escaped the direct monitoring of the state, coupled with the oriental Salafism’s rejection of taqlīd created the conditions for the Salafī hostility towards the state-monitored Maliki ‘ulama’ of the Zeituna. In Tunisia, the rejection of taqlīd was thus both an ideological and a political stance in times of authoritarian secularism.

Today, however, we put forth the hypothesis that a fourth trend is now emerging, namely an abutment of Salafism on Malikism, similar to the way Wahhabi Salafism developed primarily on Hanbali foundations. As shown in the following pages, Tunisian Salafism is reassessing its lā madhhabiyya position and moderating its rejection of taqlīd towards an acceptance of the Maliki juridical school. This evolution is contingent on the turbulent post-revolutionary Tunisian context.

Salafism and Malikism in Tunisia After 2011

After the 2010-2011 revolution, a third generation of Salafī actors entered the public space in Tunisia following a new wave of Islamic revivalism that was reminiscent of the 1970s. This new Salafī sahwa (revival) first appeared as a broad, spontaneous and unstructured phenomenon in the aftermath of regime change and the liberalization of the religious space, left largely uncontrolled by the state during the first two years of the revolution.⁶⁵

⁶⁴ Lauzière, The Making of Salafism, 8.

With the fall of Ben Ali's authoritarian regime, the dimension and characteristics of the religious sphere changed dramatically; evolving from a quietist religiosity solely concerned with individual behaviour, Salafism became active and open to social and political activism. It took the shape of a semi-institutionalized system of scholar-leaders and Salafi figures who acted in different forms ranging from radical (social contestation) to scholastic (religious teaching association) to political (parties).⁶⁶ If Islamist activists enjoyed a hegemony on party politics through the Ennahdha party, Salafis mainly occupied the space of radical contention and religious teaching (formal and informal), especially among the newly Islamized revolutionary youth.⁶⁷ New Salafi religious teachers came from abroad (particularly Egypt, Syria, Mauritania, and Saudi Arabia) while the improvised "homemade" transmitters of religious knowledge of the previous period became activist shaykhs.⁶⁸ Between 2011 and 2013, at the peak of Salafi militancy, a league of religious scholars and preachers called Rabta Tunisiyya li-l-Jami'iyat al-Islamiyya (the Tunisian League of Islamic Associations) was created under the leadership of Mokhtar Jibeli (president), Bechir Ben Hassen (vice-president) and Kamel Marzouqi (spiritual ⁶⁵ Aaron Y. Zelin, Your Sons are at Your Service. Tunisia's Missionaries of Jihad (New York: Columbia University Press, 2020).

⁶⁶ Fabio Merone and Francesco Cavatorta, "Salafist movement and sheikh-ism in the Tunisian democratic transition." Middle East Law and Governance 5, no. 3 (2013): 308-30. <https://doi.org/10.1163/18763375-00503004>.

⁶⁷ Fabio Merone, "Enduring class struggle in Tunisia: the fight for identity beyond political Islam." British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 42, no. 1 (2014): 74-87. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13530194.2015.973188>.

⁶⁸ Interview with Shaykh Houcem al-Ajmi, teacher of Usul al-Fiqh, Imam Malik Association, September 28, 2019, El Manar 1.

mentor).⁶⁹ For a while, this league became the formal institution of a religious public oscillating between quietist and activist poles. While this association is now inactive, we see its leading figures appearing regularly on the Tunisian Islamic channel Al Insan TV which invites both Salafi scholars and `ulama' with a more traditional Maliki formation such as Farid El Beji and `Umar ibn `Umar.⁷⁰

Stemming from this renewed Salafi milieu, the Salafi-Jihadi current emerged in post-revolutionary Tunisia. If at first, Salafi-Jihadis often shared the same teaching spaces with other Salafis, as was the case for the Imam Malik University where, according to its secretary-general, many students had Jihadi sympathies a separate Salafi-Jihadi current came into being following the creation of Ansar al-Sharia in April 2011.⁷¹ The latter was a radical social movement opposed to the regime and the democratization process. In addition to relying on an ideologically distinct literature (the Salafi-Jihadi theoreticians Abu Muhammad al-Maqdisi and Abu Qutada al-Filastini), Salafi-Jihadis structured a new trend characterized by its stark opposition to any form of institutional participation that would lead to compromise with the emerging liberal-democratic political system. This explains why they could not rely on any shaykh or charismatic figure except those who directly participated in or supported previous armed jihads (Afghanistan, Chechnya, Bosnia, Iraq) such as Abu Iyadh al-Tunisi, a Jihadi veteran who participated in the assassination of Ahmad Shah Massoud in 2011 before being jailed in Tunisia in 2003.⁷² Salafi-Jihadis also rejected official Maliki ulema, whom they viewed as both religiously deviant and politically subservient to the impious regime in place. In 2012, a specific council of shaykhs was created in order to channel this “revolutionary enthusiasm.”⁷³ These shaykhs – Khatib al-Idrissi, Abu Zubahir, Muhammad al-Khalif, Muhammad Abu Bakr, Khamis al-Majri, Abu `Abdallah and Abu Iyadh – constituted the main religious references of the Salafi-Jihadi public. Among them, Abu Iyadh was the initiator of the Salafi-Jihadi organization Ansar al-Sharia (AST) that by 2013 had attracted the sympathy (or the direct militancy) of most of the Salafi public.⁷⁴ Shaykh Khatib al-Idrissi, considered to be the “shaykh of the Jihadis” however opposed any form of organization and later distanced himself from AST with a small group of dissident Salafi-Jihadis.⁷⁵ After August 2013, when Ansar al-Sharia was outlawed as a terrorist organization, the group imploded.⁷⁶ While some leaders such as Seif

⁶⁹ The official name is al-Jabha al-Tunisiyya li-l-Jama'iat al-Islamiyya, commonly known simply as Rabta, which means "league," not to be confused with the Rabta Qur'ania, created at the end of the 1960s under Bourguiba.

⁷⁰ We thus distinguish between autodidact Salafi scholars, who often have a learning experience in Salafi circles or universities abroad (Marzouqi, Bechir Ben Hassan), and ulema who have acquired a religious diploma from a major religious school anchored in a school of law (Mokhtar Jibeli and Farid El Beji, who both studied at the Zeituna). These ulema are distinguishable by the white and red turban ('amama) they wear, which symbolizes the rank of a religious shaykh. They usually have a solid formation in Maliki fiqh and thus do not reject legal schools. Jibeli obtained a doctorate in 2014 entitled "Renewal in Maliki Jurisprudence between 1300 and 1431," while El Beji published several books on Maliki fiqh, which he teaches at the association Dar al-Hadith al-Zeituniyya he founded in Tunis in 2011. Besides, El Beji has been criticizing Salafis harshly, including Bechir Ben Hassan in 2012.

⁷¹ Interview with Muhammad al-Kharraf, general-secretary of the Imam Malik University, February 20, 2013, Tunis.

⁷² Stefano Maria Torelli, “A Portrait of Tunisia’s Ansar al-Shari’a Leader Abu Iyad al-Tunisi: His Strategy on Jihad,” Militant Leadership Monitor 4, no. 8 (2013).

⁷³ Interview with Abu Abdallah al Tounsi, one of the members of this council, winter 2012, Sidi Bouzid.

⁷⁴ At its peak, the group claimed a membership of 70,000 strong. Interview with Bilal Chawachi, former Ansar al-Sharia leader, November 5, 2012, Tunis.

⁷⁵ Ibid.

⁷⁶ The state cracked down on the group as early as May 10-11, when security services rounded up Ansar al-Sharia members who were delivering public lectures or distributing their literature on the street. See Aaron Y. Zelin, “Standoff Between the Tunisian Government and Ansar al-Sharia,” Policy Analysis, The Washington Institute, 14 May 2013, <https://www.washingtoninstitute.org/policy-analysis/view/standoff-between-the-tunisian-government-and-ansar-al-sharia> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

Eddine al-Rais, Sami Essid and Hassen el-Brik maintained a non-violent approach, repression led to the radicalization of large swathes of the Salafi-Jihadi movement, who either joined jihad fronts abroad (such as Abu Iyadh in Libya and Kamel Zarrouk in Syria) or the Tunisia-based fighting group Uqba ibn Nafi'.⁷⁷ Violence in the country was tamped down for two years, but resurfaced forcefully with the Bardo National Museum attack in March 2015, the Sousse beach attack in June 2015, the attack on Presidential Guard personnel in Tunis in November 2015, and an attempt to take over the town of Ben Gardane on the Libyan border in March 2016. Simultaneously, the state arrested hundreds of Jihadis while 16,000 individuals were prevented from leaving the country for jihad between 2014-2016 according to government sources.⁷⁸ Today, Salafi-Jihadis have lost their popular appeal and remain at the margin.

Those who have renounced violence constitute a pool of possible recruits for non-Jihadi Salafis, and in particular for two tendencies: the scientific/scripturalist ('ilmi) and the political (siyasi).⁷⁹ Scientific Salafism can in turn be split in two sub-categories: scholastic and quietist. The abovementioned shaykhs, Bechir Ben Hassen, Kamel Marzouqi and Mokhtar Jibeli, are the most recognizable scholastic Salafis in the Tunisian public sphere. They focus on religious teaching/learning, although they are not opposed to social activism and can join or create networks of associations to achieve their objectives (such as the aforementioned League). Some tension with the most activist orientation of this trend embodied by Jibeli may however appear.

⁷⁷ Fabio Merone, "Between Social Contention and Takfirism," 14-15 ; "Les Brigades Okba Ben Nafii ont pris la place des Ansar Chariaa," African Manager, 26 March 2015, <https://africanmanager.com/les-brigades-okba-ben-nafii-ont-pris-la-place-des-ansar-chariaa/> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

⁷⁸ Aaron Y. Zelin, "Tunisian Jihadism Five Years After Ansar al-Sharia," Policy Analysis, The Washington Institute, 16 September 2018, <https://www.washingtoninstitute.org/policy-analysis/view/tunisian-jihadism-five-years-after-ansar-al-sharia> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

⁷⁹ Quintan Wiktorowicz, "Anatomy of the Salafi Movement," Studies in Conflict & Terrorism 29 (2016): 207-39, <https://doi.org/10.1080/10576100500497004>.

This was the case, for instance, on the issue of the radical Salafi youths who Jibeli wanted to integrate into a large Salafi front alongside scholastic and political Salafis, while Marzouqi and Ben Hassan refused.⁸⁰ In contrast with this scholastic-activist current, the so-called madkhali current (i.e. the followers of Saudi shaykh Rabi al-Madkhali) embodies a quietist trend that refuses any form of organization or activism and opposition to the state. For this reason, and because they remain a marginal group with little coordination and no leading shaykh as of today, it is more difficult to identify them. They are present in some mosques in al-Mourouj (the South-east suburbs of Tunis), such as the al-Fawz mosque in Mourouj 5.⁸¹ They usually claim to operate outside law schools, although in practice they tend to follow the Hanbali maddhab favoured by official Wahhabi shaykhs.⁸²

Finally, we find the proper political Salafis, those who formally legalized Salafist political engagement after the fall of the regime. While several Salafi parties tried their electoral chances after 2011,⁸³ the main representative of this trend is Jabhat al-Islah, stemming from the al-Jabha al-Islamiyya, which did not refuse Malikism.⁸⁴ Less concerned with religious learning and matters of law schools compared to scholastic Salafis, they however played an important role in mediating between the non-political Salafis and the official Islamist political establishment (Ennahdha). In the period between 2011 and 2013 they endeavoured to channel the mass of

⁸⁰ Interview with Kamel Marzouqi, November 21, 2019, Soussa.

⁸¹ Personal observation by Théo Blanc, summer 2019. According to Muhammad, secretary general of the Tunisian section of the International Association of Muslim scholars (Interview, November 18, 2019, association headquarter, Tunis), they work for the police in giving information on ‘suspicious’ people attending the prayers in the mosques.

⁸² Stéphane Lacroix, “Between Revolution and Apoliticism.”

⁸³ At the beginning of 2012, three small Salafist parties Jabhat-al Islah, Hizb-al Asala, and Hizb-al Rahma were able to register with the ministry of the interior.

⁸⁴ Torelli et al., “Salafism in Tunisia,” 142.

radical Salafis into their party.⁸⁵ Ennahdha also exploited this party to maintain a channel of communication with the radical Salafis until mid-2013. They finally grew distant from Ennahdha and converged towards new, oppositional political experiences at the 2019 elections.⁸⁶ Their electoral failures in 2011 and 2014, their low appeal in the Salafi community, the dislocation of their Salafi base following the repressive turn as well as their inability to get out of Ennahdha's shadow caused the near disappearance of this political Salafi trend after the 2014 elections.⁸⁷

The 2013-2014 Turning Point: Securitization and Domestication of the Religious Field

In 2013, the assassination of two prominent Tunisian politicians (Chokri Belaid and Muhammad Brahmi) by a Jihadi commando allegedly linked to Ansar al-Sharia triggered a severe political crisis which brought criticism of Ennahdha's leniency vis-à-vis Salafis to a climax.⁸⁸ On August 27, 2013, Prime Minister Ali Larayedh listed Ansar al-Sharia as a terrorist organization, before Ennahdha was forced to relinquish power to a technocratic government to preserve the stability of the country and secure its survival in the precarious political situation.⁸⁹

⁸⁵ Interviews with Muhammad Khouja, October 24, 2013 and April 17, 2018, Tunis.

⁸⁶ Théo Blanc and Ester Sigillò, "Beyond the 'Islamists vs. Secularists' Cleavage: The Rise of New Challengers After the 2019 Tunisian Elections," Policy Brief, European University Institute (2019), <https://doi.org/10.2870/142604>.

⁸⁷ Blanc, "La politisation du salafisme," 159-71.

⁸⁸ Ansar al-Sharia did not claim responsibility for the attack and most analysts agree that it was unlikely ordered by its leadership. The two assassinations were later claimed by ISIS and attributed to Abu Bakr al-Hakim aka Abu Mouqatil, a French Tunisian who joined ISIS after the attack. See Christine Petré, "Tunisian Salafism: The Rise and Fall of Ansar al-Sharia," Policy Brief 209, Hivos/FRIDE (2015).

⁸⁹ Monica Marks, "Tunisia", in Rethinking Political Islam, ed. Shadi Hamid and William McCants (New York: Oxford University Press, 2017), 32-53.

Once the new constitution was adopted in January 2014 and Ennahdha stepped down from power, the newly established technocratic government led by Mehdi Jomaa (January 2014 - February 2015) launched a large security campaign targeting Salafi teaching and preaching activities (e.g. da'wa tents of Ansar al-Sharia in marginalized neighbourhoods, but also charitable activities with religious orientation).⁹⁰ In June 2014, the Ministry of Religious Affairs declared that 90 mosques out of 5,100 still escaped the control of the government and later proceeded to dismiss “radical” imams such as Bechir Ben Hassan in July 2015 and Ridha Jawadi in September 2015. The Jomaa government followed by the Habib Essid government (February 2015-August 2016) also clamped down on Salafi associations and schools under charges of illicit foreign funding and/or terrorism in the framework of a “normalization” campaign.⁹¹

The aim of this repressive turn was twofold: one the one hand, the eradication of dubious Salafi activists who challenged the state and, on the other, the (re-)regulation of the religious field.⁹² New legal measures undertaken by the Jomaa government established transparency and control over religious associations in order to overcome the deficiencies and loopholes of the

⁹⁰ Ester Sigillò, “Islamism and the rise of Islamic charities.”

⁹¹ Alaya Allani, “Radical religious movements during the transition. The example of Ansar Al Sharia in Tunisia: Growth and development. Prospects: 2011-2014,” in Constitution of Tunisia: Part 2, UNDP (2016), 8; Fabio Merone et al., “Nahda and Tunisian Islamic Activism,” in New Opposition in the Middle East, ed. Dara Conduit and Shahram Akbarzadeh (Singapore: Palgrave Macmillan, 2018), 182.

⁹² “Entretien avec Mounir Tlili, ministre des Affaires religieuses : « des mosquées encore otages des radicaux »”, Réalités, July 8, 2014, <https://www.realites.com.tn/2014/07/entretien-avec-mounir-tlili-ministre-des-affaires-religieuses-des-mosquees-encore-otages-des-radicaux/> (accessed on 27 February 2021); “La Tunisie renforce l’enseignement de l’islam modéré.”

2011 decree-law.⁹³ According to `Ali Amira, the General Director of Associations and Political Parties at the Presidency of the Government between 2014 and 2017: “the decree-law on associations, enacted immediately after the revolution, is too vague, since it gave too much freedom to all Tunisians wishing to create an association. [...] We have to better clarify certain aspects concerning the associative life, otherwise, we are going to lose control, especially over Salafi associations, their illicit funding and their link with terrorist groups.”⁹⁴ Thus, in 2014, 449 associations were sanctioned for failing to register the receipt of probable illicit foreign funding, 179 because their statute was not clear or breached the law (for example, charitable associations overstepped their legal statute by teaching the Qur’an), and 236 associations were closed due to their links with terrorist groups.⁹⁵ In accordance with the above-mentioned measures, for instance, three associative branches of the Imam Malik Association, respectively based in Nabeul, Soussa and Bizerte, were closed, while the core association faced two closure attempts in 2015 and 2017, but won both hearings.⁹⁶

Interestingly, this crackdown has been accompanied by a campaign promoting “a moderate and Tunisian Islam.”⁹⁷ Indeed, parallel to the repressive campaign, a series of actions were taken to monitor the content of religious education. Governmental measures were ⁹³ After 2011, organisms regulating the control of associative activities were created under the decree-law 88: the general directorate for political parties and associations, a body linked to the presidency of the republic, which has a more technical role, and the ministry for the relations with civil society, which has a more political role. See Ester Sigillò, “Mobilizing for or through development? Trajectories of civic activism in post-authoritarian Tunisia”, (PhD diss., Scuola Normale Superiore, 2018), 158.

⁹⁴ Interview with Ali Amira, July 3, 2018, Tunis.

⁹⁵ Ester Sigillò, “Islamism and the rise of Islamic charities.”

⁹⁶ Interview with Muhammad Amin executive director of the Association “Imam Malik,” February 25, 2020, Manar 1.

⁹⁷ Interview with an official of the ministry of religious affairs, 2 July 2018, Tunis, instituted to check the educational background of teachers (who could no longer be recruited from abroad) and control the materials (such as books) used in support of religious studies.⁹⁸ In June 2014, Prime Minister Medhi Jomaa and Minister of Religious Affairs Mounir Tlili also announced the creation of a religious institute in Kairouan based on the Zeituni teaching curriculum and supervised by the Zeituna in coordination with the ministry of religious affairs. The two officials based this initiative on article 42 of the constitution that promotes “values of tolerance [and the] rejection of violence.”⁹⁹ They presented this as a way to contain the diffusion of Salafi ideology.¹⁰⁰ The Ministry of Religious affairs also promoted the Rabta Qur’ania, the League of Quranic associations founded in Tunisia at the end of the 1960s as the model of religious teaching for associations to emulate.¹⁰¹ According to the vice-director of the religious organization: “All our religious courses rely on the Zeituni tradition, our source is a Tunisian Islam of Maliki inspiration.”¹⁰² Overall, the state endeavoured to promote a “moderate

⁹⁸ Interview with Muhammad Amin, executive director of the Association “Imam Malik,” March 19, 2018, Manar 1.

⁹⁹ Tunisian Constitution, January 2014, article 42, page 9, accessible at https://www.constituteproject.org/constitution/Tunisia_2014.pdf (accessed on 27 February 2021).

¹⁰⁰ “La Tunisie renforce l’enseignement de l’islam modéré,” Kapitalis, 28 June 2014, <http://www.kapitalis.com/politique/23153-la-tunisie-renforce-l-enseignement-de-l-islam-moderé-video.html> (accessed on 27 February 2021); “Mounir Tlili : Promouvoir un discours religieux modéré et rationnel” ; “Entretien avec Mounir Tlili, ministre des Affaires religieuses : « des mosquées encore otages des radicaux »”, Réalités, July 8, 2014, <https://www.realites.com.tn/2014/07/entretien-avec-mounir-tlili-ministre-des-affaires-religieuses-des-mosques-encore-otages-des-radicaux/> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

¹⁰¹ Interviews with the Secretary General of the Rabta Qur’ania and an official of the Ministry of Religious Affairs, July 2018, Tunis.

¹⁰² Interview, June 20, 2018. The role played by the ninth century scholar Sahnun ibn Sa’id ibn Habib at-Tanukhi, who systematized the Maliki school of law, is particularly emphasized in Tunisia. See also the discourse of Mounir Tlili, Minister of Religious Affairs: “ترشيد الخطاب الديني والاحاصه بدور العبادة ودعم التعليم الزيتوني” (“Orientation of the Tunisian” Islam derived both from the spirit of the new constitution as well as from the specificity of traditional Tunisian Islam rooted in Malikism.¹⁰³

In fact, the Maliki rite is often cited by ‘ulama’, state officials and outside observers as a key aspect of Tunisian religious tolerance, contrasting starkly with the Salafi version of Islam.¹⁰⁴ After 2011, the disconnect with the religious tradition of the country was often pointed out by scholars as the cause of the religious radicalization of the new generations. According to the researcher Raphaël Lefèvre, the rise of Salafism in the entire North African region following the Arab revolutions constituted “a symptom of the failure of ‘traditional’ or ‘official’ Islam built on the Maliki school of religious law.”¹⁰⁵ Consequently, addressing the post-revolutionary “Salafi surge” would entail addressing the “Maliki crisis” by “repositioning traditional Maliki teachings at the heart of North Africa’s religious scene.”¹⁰⁶ On the side of religious actors, we observe a similar discourse. For example, the secretary general of the Rabta Qur’ania stated: “The specificity of Tunisia is that our Islam has a Maliki reference, so it is moderate, in contrast with Salafism.”¹⁰⁷ The emblematic status of the Zeituna in this Tunisian Islam is also reasserted.

religious discourse, awareness of the role of worship and support to Zeituni teaching”), YouTube, June 27, 2014, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=vY5G9V2PgRw&feature=emb_title (accessed on 27 February 2021).

¹⁰³ While Tunisian Maliki Islam is sponsored by the government as a ‘moderate’ alternative, Maliki fiqh as such is not necessarily moderate in absolute terms. For instance, Malikism punishes homosexuality with death by stoning, while Shafiism and Hanbalism sanction it with whipping, and Hanafism does not recognize it as a hadd (breaching of sharia). Therefore, the process of Malikization we describe here is not tantamount to ideological moderation, as we do not deal with the substantive content of the actors’ ideas.

¹⁰⁴ Raphaël Lefèvre, “North Africa’s Maliki Crisis,” The Journal of North African Studies 20, no. 5 (2015): 683, <https://doi.org/10.1080/13629387.2015.1091162>; Longo, “Salafism and Takfirism in Tunisia.”

¹⁰⁵ Lefèvre, “North Africa’s Maliki Crisis,” 684.

¹⁰⁶ Ibid., 687.

¹⁰⁷ Interview with the Secretary General of the Rabta Qur’ania, June 20, 2018, Tunis. .

According to an imam of the Association of Sharia Sciences in La Marsa, “our main reference is the Zeituna university, as it represents the pillar of Tunisian Islam. This is for us inspirational, as a matter of fact its professors work with us.”¹⁰⁸

Interestingly, another actor contributed to the promotion of a “moderate” domestic Islam, namely the Islamist party Ennahdha. Although the old generation of Ennahdha’s militants had historically opposed the majority of Zeituni ‘ulama’ – considered too passive against the secularist policies of the Bourguiba regime – after the revolution the Islamist party restored the Zeituna mosque/university tradition as a positive heritage and proactively promoted the revival of its educational role as the guarantor of religious moderation.¹⁰⁹ The result of this re-evaluation was the re-adoption of a Tunisian way prompted by the historical leaders, such as Ahmida Ennaifer, one the most prominent figure linked to the Zeituna mosque.¹¹⁰ According to Ennaifer, “after the revolution, things evolved differently. There was this idea [among Islamists], following the rise of Wahhabism [...], this willingness to promote (valoriser) this return to Malikism, because it seemed more tolerant, more open, more traditional.”¹¹¹

Reference to the traditions went in parallel to the claim of a “moderate” Islam. As explicitly expressed in the 2012 congress conclusive statement: “Ennahda Party [...] believes it is a continuation of the Arab-Islamic reform movement from Khairreddine Ettounisi.”¹¹² The latter (1822/23-90), taking inspiration from Ibn Khaldun’s theories, put forward the concepts

¹⁰⁸ Interview with an imam of the Association of Sharia Sciences who requested anonymity, July 3, 2019, Tunis, La Marsa

¹⁰⁹ Wolf, Political Islam in Tunisia.

¹¹⁰ Loretta Dell’Aguzzo and Ester Sigillò, “Political legitimacy and variations in state-religion relations in Tunisia,” The Journal of North African Studies 22 no. 4 (2017): 511-35.

¹¹¹ Interview with Hmida Ennaifer, January 8, 2020, Bardo.

¹¹² “Concluding Statement of the 9th Ennahdha Party Conference,” July 12-16, 2012, <https://www.facebook.com/Nahdha.International/posts/245449198891679> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

of freedom, equality, democracy, and individual rights in an Islamic language. According to the secretary general of the Tunis section of Da 'wa wa Islah, an association founded by Ennahda's activists after the 2012 congress: "Our aim is to reform (islāh) the Islamic thought and action by applying Islamic values to modern life, yet in tune with the religious traditions of the country."¹¹³

This re-positioning of Ennahdha vis-à-vis the Zeituni heritage stemmed directly from its strategy of integration and normalization in post-revolutionary politics. Indeed, seeking legitimacy in the new democratic landscape, the party progressively positioned itself as the keeper of a "national Islam" in tune with the constitutional principles set out in the 2014 charter.¹¹⁴ The preamble to the constitution states that the Tunisian people is indeed committed to "the teachings of Islam (ta'lim al-islām)," which is an open and moderate Islam "inspired by the heritage of our civilization, [...] of our history, from our enlightened reformist movements that are based on the foundations of our Arab-Islamic identity."¹¹⁵ This formulation was preferred to the notion of sharia, which Salafis wanted to enshrine in the constitution, but that Ennahdha had chosen to abandon as soon as in March 2012.

The summer of 2013 actually marked a watershed for the transformation of the Islamist party, as Ennahda definitively divorced itself from the Salafist wing, abandoning the Islamic project of transformation of Tunisian society solicited in particular by the Salafi-Jihadi movement Ansar al-Sharia. Notably, Ennahda pushed forward its strategy of transformation into a post-Islamist party rooted in the Tunisian religious tradition, in order to secure its acceptance by secular forces. This became particularly clear in 2016, when at its 10th congress Ennahdha announced its “specialization” (takhasuṣ) in politics, thus abandoning all religious activities as required by organic and constitutional law.¹¹⁶ This measure eventually forged the Ennahdha’s moderation discourse in a time of legitimacy crisis. The Tunisian president himself, during the opening ceremony held in Radès, stated: “Ennahdha has become a civil party and within our traditions Islam does not contradict democracy.”¹¹⁷ Overall, after the political crisis of 2013, and in tune with the new “constitutional spirit,” Ennahdha contributed to rehabilitate a domestic Islam, rooted in the Tunisian traditions, in opposition to Salafism.

¹¹³ Interview with a person who requested anonymity, July 2, 2018, Tunis.

¹¹⁴ Interview with Oussama Sghaier, Ennahda's spoke runner, May 22, 2016, Hammamet. Article 6 of the constitution enshrines the principle of state control and supervision of mosques' partisan neutrality.

¹¹⁵ "Tunisian Constitution," January 2014: 3, <http://www.lse.ac.uk/GranthamInstitute/wp-content/uploads/laws/4808.pdf> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

With this broad contextual excursus as a background, in the following pages we will show how Salafi actors have recently adapted their religious categories to this context. Notably, we argue that the securitization campaign backed by the promotion of a “moderate” and “domestic” Islam in the official religious discourse created the conditions for the development of Salafi-Malikism. In a context where the religious sphere became highly regulated and where this re-regulation saw the legitimization of broad strata of the political and civil society, including religious actors, residual Salafi actors increasingly adapted by reassessing their stance on Malikism. In this understanding, the adaptation to Malikism was the sine qua non condition for Salafis to be recognized as an indigenous and “moderate” form of Islam and ultimately to preserve their preaching and teaching activities.

Salafi-Malikism: The Discourse of Jurisprudential Compromise

At first sight the adaptation of Salafism to Malikism and to a Tunisian nationalist identity may look paradoxical, first because the academic literature pointed out that Salafis traditionally reject schools of law, and second because in Tunisia Salafis are routinely associated with Saudi Wahhabism. Its critics emphasize the latter point, contending that Salafism brings into the country a type of religious practice that is not suitable to the specific national traditions of the country.¹¹⁸ By overcoming those obstacles and reacting to its religious nationalist critics, the shapers of Salafi-Malikism endeavour to demonstrate that Salafism and Malikism are not antagonistic. They thus frame a new discourse that allows Salafism to adapt to national circumstances and accept to be “Tunisified.” This discourse is both a response to the official discourses mentioned above emphasizing a Tunisian Islam, and a clear indication of a willingness to integrate a Tunisian religious specificity. Three core arguments feature in the Salafi-Maliki discourse: 1) Malikism and Salafism are not in contradiction with each other; 2) the Zeituni learning tradition is also a Salafi one; 3) Salafism is not to be equated with Saudi Wahhabism.

¹¹⁶ Ester Sigillò, “Ennahdha et l’essor des associations islamiques en Tunisie.”

¹¹⁷ Ghannouchi keynote speech, Ennahdha’s Xth Congress, Hammamet 22 May 2016, obtained by Ester Sigillò’s notes through participant observation.

This evolution is particularly salient in the discourse of the two main associations of scholastic Salafism, the Imam Malik University and the Imam Malik Association, which managed to survive after the 2014 crackdown. We also rely on the discourse of grassroots Salafi militants as well as independent Salafi shaykhs such as Bechir Ben Hassen, whose speech at the Carthage presidential palace played a pioneering role in demonstrating the compatibility of Salafism and Malikism and thus constitutes a good starting point for analysis:

“Unfortunately, some people think that the Salafi methodology is a new religion that is invading Tunisia. This is amazing! In the first place, this republic and these people are Muslim and those who brought Islam to them are the prophet’s companions [...] Second, if we talk about the school of law, it is the school of the Imam Malik. Where is the Imam Malik coming from? From Madina; he doesn’t come from Tunis or Kairouan but from the city of the Prophet. He [...] is among the pious ancestors and the Maliki school is at its origin a Salafi school. [...] We do not isolate the Salafi from the Maliki school, because Malik and the Malikis follow the Salafi method.”¹¹⁹

¹¹⁸ Hamadi Redissi, Une histoire du wahhabisme. Comment l’islam sectaire est devenu l’islam (Paris: Points, 2016).

According to Ben Hassen, then, Salafism and Malikism are not antagonistic. Malik Ibn Anas (the founding-father of Malikism) used a Salafi method and was himself a salaf (a pious predecessor), therefore there is no contradiction in being simultaneously Salafi and Maliki. This statement finds confirmation in other Salafis’ declarations. For example, Hassine, a student of the Imam Malik Association, considers that “We should not look at Malikism as being in contradiction with Salafism. Malik was a Salafi. To bring the two into opposition is a mistake.”¹²⁰

The Salafi-Maliki discourse also focuses on a shared Zeituni tradition. By appropriating its heritage, in fact, Tunisian Salafis call for recognition as a part of the Tunisian religious fabric. “We see people who want to separate the Salafi method from the Zeituni education system. And this is also a mistake. Why? Because we have imams in the history of Zeituna who followed the Salafi methodology.”¹²¹ In what way were they Salafis? In that “they fought the blameworthy practices of worshipping tombs and other practices contrary to the pure ṭawḥīd (Oneness of God).” Bechir Ben Hassen’s statement is clear: there is no Zeituni tradition that diverges from Salafism. Zeituni shaykhs were Salafis and therefore contemporary Salafis should feel themselves to be legitimate repositories of their heritage.¹²² Shaykh Kamel Marzouqi, president of Imam Malik University, reiterated the same point in a 2013 interview, asserting that “a Zeituni tradition different from a Salafi one does not exist. The Zeituni shaykhs, such as Tahar Ben Achour, were Salafis. We also adopt Malikism.”¹²³ Maliki fiqh thus occupies a central place in the teaching curriculum of both the Imam Malik Association and the University Imam Malik led by Marzouqi. One student described this latter association as a “Salafi ‘ilmī (scientific/scripturalist) school that embraces Malikism.”¹²⁴

¹¹⁹ Bechir Ben Hassen can be considered as the pioneering intellectual carving a Maliki-friendly Salafi discourse. This speech was given in November 2012 at the presidential palace in Carthage following an invitation of President Moncef Marzouki. Bechir Ben Hassan, "محاضرة الشيخ بشير بن حسن حول الظاهرة السلفية في تونس ج1" ("Conference of Shaykh Bechir Ben Hassan on the Salafi phenomenon in Tunisia part 1"); recorded November 2012, YouTube, 26:00, <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=keMXSIj9VEE> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

¹²⁰ Interview with xxxxx, November 19, 2019, Manar 1.

¹²¹ Imams cited by Ben Hassen are Muhammad Mekki Ben Azuz, Shaykh Muhammad Hacine and Othman Bin Mekki al-Tuzri Zubaidi.

This integration of Malikism and the Zeituni tradition cannot be credible however without a dissociation of Tunisian Salafism from Wahhabism. According to Bechir Ben Hassen, “associating so-called Wahhabism with Salafism is a mistake [...]. Salafism is not a jama‘a (group), or a way of dressing, a trend or an ideology, but a methodology (manhaj).”¹²⁵ Ibn `Abd al-Wahhab in the context of this speech is a “son of the Arabian peninsula” and the relationship with this country is described as merely “emotional.”¹²⁶ Salafis do not deny a natural link with Saudi Arabia, but put it in terms of a natural relationship with the land where Islam originated; in so doing, they seek to downplay its implications in terms of cultural and ideological influences. Shaykh Marzouqi told us: “We made an agreement with the University of Madina, ¹²² “Conference of Shaykh Bechir Ben Hassan on the Salafi phenomenon in Tunisia part 1”, minute 27:26.

¹²³ Interview with Kamel Marzouqi, February 20, 2013, Tunis.

¹²⁴ Interview with a student of this association who requested anonymity, June 24, 2019, Tunis.

¹²⁵ "الشيخ بشير بن حسن - عبد الفتاح مورو- السلفية في تونس" ("Shaykh Bechir Ben Hassan – Abd al-Fatah Mourou – Salafism in Tunisia"), recorded March 2012 on Al Watania 2 TV, YouTube, 30:18-31:20, <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kGrZYiMd1tM> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

¹²⁶ Bechir Ben Hassan, "محاضرة الشيخ بشير بن حسن حول الظاهرة السلفية في تونس ج 2" ("Conference of Shaykh Bechir Ben Hassan on Salafism in Tunisia part 2"), Filmed November 2012, YouTube, 26:17, <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=bBje5d4983I&t=1632s> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

where [the founding member] shaykh Shawat studied [...]. It is clear that we have ‘emotional relations’ with this country (our prophet was from there). [...] This is the country of all Muslims.”¹²⁷ Nevertheless, Salafis interviewed in Tunisia were keen on distinguishing historical Salafism from its contemporary Wahhabi version. For example, Houcem al-Ajmi, a teacher at the Imam Malik Association, explains that historical Salafism “means a Salafism that refers to the ‘aqīda (creed) in the way of the salaf al-ṣāliḥ (pious predecessors) before the formation of the four schools; before the split between Asharism and the muḥaddithūn (hadith specialists) of the ninth century. The other [i.e. contemporary] Salafism is that of Saudia Arabia, which refers to Ibn `Abd al-Wahhab and Ibn Taymiyya.”¹²⁸ This resonates with Lauzière’s account that in medieval times the original Salafi creed simply amounted to a Hanbali theology (rejection of rationalism and fideism) that could be combined with any of the four legal schools as long as it remained faithful to the method of the forefathers (the salaf).¹²⁹ Salafis’ distancing vis-à-vis Wahhabi Salafism thus enables them to claim a historical form of Salafism that was not embedded in any school of law nor opposed to them in principle.

Salafi-Malikis also describe the reconsideration of Malikism as the product of societal pressure on Salafism, understood as the public delegitimization of Salafi beliefs and practices. According to Houcem al-Ajmi, many Salafis began to embrace Malikism because people accused them of seeking to impose religious practices that people are not accustomed to. Malikism “became the way to be integrated and accepted by Tunisian society,” he said.¹³⁰ This realization intervened in a context where the self-appellation “Salafi” had become a negative

¹²⁷ Interview with Kamel Marzouqi, February 20, 2013, Tunis.

¹²⁸ Interview with Houcem al-Ajmi, November 19, 2019, Manar 1.

¹²⁹ Lauzière, The Making of Salafism; Henri Lauzière, “L’histoire du salafisme : ses pièges et ses mythes,” Moyen-Orient 33 (2017): 18-23.

¹³⁰ Interview with Houcem al-Ajmi, September 28, 2019, Manar 1.

marker eliciting high suspicion from both state and society and that many therefore chose to abandon or to not publicly disclose.¹³¹ As a consequence, we observe a process of absorption of Malikism by Salafism, or in other words a type of Salafism (partially) embedded in the Maliki school and that accordingly claims to respect “Tunisian specificity.”¹³² Salafis felt the need to accommodate the society around them, as had happened to Ennahda before.¹³³

Bechir Ben Hassen’s statements are also interesting because they are not addressed to non-Salafi critics only, but also to a Salafi public that is unconvinced about being Maliki and Salafi at the same time. “Many of the [Salafi] youth have a prejudice against Malikism because they saw how people [in the authoritarian regime] used it to deny the evidence of the [Qur’anic and prophetic] text (dalīl qaṭ‘ay).” Under certain conditions, however, it is acceptable to use Malikism, Ben Hassan contends: “Malik is a human like all humans. He can be wrong, so it is not necessary to imitate each of his ḥukm (judgment) in a blind way; each argument must be supported by a dalīl (textual proof) from the Qur’an and the Sunna anyway.”¹³⁴ A former student of the Imam Malik Association put it this way: “Salafis are not against any particular

¹³¹ Blanc “Être “islamiste” ou salafiste” en 2018.”

¹³² Bechir Ben Hassan: “When I was in the country of emigration, I used to teach Ibn Taymiyya and Abd Al-Wahhab’s books. I used to teach fiqh following the Hanbali school. When I came to stay here, I saw a Tunisian specificity and respected it.” See “البشير بن حسن حول الفكر الوهابي و تأثيره في تونس” (“Bechir Ben Hassan about Wahhabi thought and influence in Tunisia.”), recorded May 2013 on TNN TV, YouTube, 7:21-8:40, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=dIon_cxrusk (accessed on 27 February 2021).

¹³³ Francesco Cavatorta and Fabio Merone, “Post-Islamism, ideological evolution and ‘la tunisianité’ of the Tunisian Islamist party al-Nahda,” Journal of Political Ideologies 20 (2015): 27-42, <https://doi.org/10.1080/13569317.2015.991508>.

¹³⁴ “Shaykh Bechir Ben Hassan – Abd al-Fatah Mourou – Salafism in Tunisia”, recorded March 2012 on Al Watania 2 TV, YouTube, 01:05:00-01:08:00, <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kGrZYiMd1tM> (accessed on 27 February 2021).

madhāb in principle, but against any extremism in the application of the madhhahīb which should not be considered as sacred untouchable sources. The Salafīs may take from the four schools if there is a clear dalīl (textual proof) for that in the tradition (Sunna) of the prophet.”¹³⁵ Salafi-Malikis thus formulate the conditions under which it is permissible to use Maliki sources; the latter cannot supersede the authority of the Qur’an and the hadith.

Convincing Salafīs of this was however not an easy process. As Houcem al-Ajmi recalls, after the revolution “it was fashionable (à la mode) to be Salafī [...]. Once I was contacted by young people who came to me to obtain legal opinions; as soon as I referred to the Maliki school for a judgement they left after castigating my reference as a bid’a (innovation). Over time however, they changed their mind. Today they are reconsidering Malikism without preconceptions.”¹³⁶ This is confirmed by Muhammad Amin, director of the Imam Malik Association, for whom “the wave of scholars who wanted to take directly and exclusively from the ṣaḥāba [the Prophet’s Companions] has now passed. Those who still want to do it are not cultivated enough, whereas those who have knowledge of a specific school of law are more qualified. We however do not say that the madhāb is one hundred per cent right; only the Qur’an is one hundred per cent right.”¹³⁷

Conclusion

In this article we have discussed the evolution of Tunisian Salafism according to the transformation of the political context. Notably, we investigated the adaptive strategies of the scholastic Salafi branch, the only visible expression of Salafism nowadays. Our main argument is that Salafism in Tunisia has been undergoing a process of ‘Malikization’ – or Islamic ‘Tunisification’ – in order to avoid being targeted as a form of religious extremism imported from the Gulf and ultimately to be allowed to operate within the renewed legal framework established after the 2013-2014 campaign of religious securitization.

¹³⁵ Interview with a former student who requested anonymity, November 19, 2019, Manar 1.

¹³⁶ Interview with Houcem al-Ajmi, September 28, 2019, Manar 1.

¹³⁷ Interview with Muhammad Amin, February 25, 2020, Manar 1.

This recent evolution is of particular importance since contemporary Salafism generally argues against the very principle of Islamic schools – although Wahhabi Salafism tends to be embedded in Hanbalism – and claims the right to perform ijtihād (free interpretation). In contrast, Tunisian Salafis conceive their Maliki evolution to be in continuity with the medieval Salafī creed theoretically compatible with all juridical schools. In this understanding, Salafī-Malikism appears more as a manhaj (methodology) of looking for Prophetic proofs than as a fixed doctrine (‘aqīda) incompatible with fiqh codifications. Salafī-Malikism thus constitutes a genuine endeavour to anchor Salafism in the Tunisian soil; one that integrates the peculiarities of the Tunisian context (both in terms of state monitoring and religious tradition) while maintaining its specific method of establishing religious normativity through the example of the pious ancestors (al-salaf al-ṣāliḥ).

The accommodation of Malikism by Salafis should however not be interpreted as a total theological overhaul of Salafism. The strict conditions under which Maliki jurisprudence can be used indicate that Salafis maintain their theological methodology which favours direct interpretation over reliance on secondary interpretation by the schools of law. Salafis may take juridical opinions in any of the four madhahīb if they are backed by evidence in the Qur’an or the Sunna (while groundless elements should be left aside).¹³⁸ This entails that the absorption of Malikism does not fundamentally change the nature of Salafism, which remains a theological approach checking the validity of religious sources against the primal source of Islam – the salaf. Restricting Islam to one madhab is thus still proscribed.¹³⁹ In other words, Salafis have not turned into Malikis. What is new, however, is the permissibility and even encouragement to use Maliki jurisprudence, in contrast with the radical interpretations of “canonical” Salafis, who claim the right to interpret the sacred texts without the mediation of law schools. This constitutes a major evolution towards the ‘Tunisification’ of Salafism i.e. religious nationalization.

¹³⁸ Interview with a Salafī who requested anonymity, January 29, 2020, Tunis.

¹³⁹ Interview with Muhammad Amin, February 25, 2020, Manar 1.